While fossil fuels are a clean source of energy that can be produced and consumed inexpensively, a major drawback of fossil fuel use is the combustion gases produced as a byproduct that are commonly discharged into the environment. While a variety of environmentally harmful substances can be generated during combustion, carbon dioxide and hydrochlorofluorocarbons (HCFCs) are two gases that are of particular concern. Carbon dioxide is commonly discharged as a byproduct of combustion, though carbon dioxide emissions have been reduced by efforts of fuel suppliers and vehicle manufacturers alike. Hydrochlorofluorocarbons (HCFCs) have been widely used as both cleaning and cooling agents for various products, and have been widely phased out in place of more environmentally friendly alternatives. Both carbon dioxide and HCFCs are readily absorbed by the atmosphere, and the emissions of these chemicals into the environment are greenhouse gases, contributing to global warming. These gases are also potent greenhouse gases, contributing to global warming through the greenhouse effect. There are numerous ways to effectively reduce the emissions of carbon dioxide and HCFCs from combustion sources, such as, for example, by switching to liquid fuel sources, switching to electric vehicles, switching to gas-electric hybrid vehicles, and varying the combustion technique. However, many technologies are being developed to address f678ea9f9e
